Abstract
The categorical recourse to the notion of structure, in its many relations, can be methodologically useful in elaborating a historical explanation, but does allow us to deduce that history itself (as the sum of all human acts actually practiced) would solidify itself in a single (or more than one) structure, even if only a discursive one.

Keywords
Theory of history, narrative, historical explanation.