Abstract
An urban space in the U.S. represents, in our days, the main form of demographic and economic concentration of the country, this in virtue of the continued processes of migration from field to city and of growing economic investments in this (pro-civil) spaces to the high density of settlers, this modifying the perception and the way of living in cities, from there the need to reframe theoretically this U.S. social relations containers, this incorporating contextually the new variables of global cut.

Keywords
Urban space, Urban growth, metropolization stages.