Abstract

Many of the concepts that we currently use to explain the new productive reality and labor relations, come from the new posfordistas theories. In this work, a brief approach to the postulates of these theories is presented from three works of Enrique de la Garza, who makes a true revision and critic of them, examining in depth the direct authors as Aglieta, Boyer and Coriat, among others. As we approach the theories on the productive models, there is no intention on carrying out an exhaustive examination, nor introducing a personal and original version of its diverse expositions. We simply consider important to locate the evidence generated by the empirical studies on the productive reorganization processes in the context of the theoretical discussion, about the models of production. This is particularly so because multiple anomalies have been detected in regards to the interpretation and predictions of the adopted theoretical frames.
