Abstract
A decree of the Mayor of Medellín in 1951, found dramatic changes in the lives of the residents of Barrio Antioquia, humble and laborious, the overnight, they appeared in the only officially accepted prostitution zone, which created a social disaster because the industry was transformed into an area of "high risk", with sales of narcotics, criminal gangs and involvement of family customs, in the presence of about 200 bars and brothels that stigmatized the neighborhood and created a conflict of which still are not spared the inhabitants, although 60 years have elapsed. This article presents the results of research conducted there.
