Abstract
The purpose of this article is to systematize some of the many ways in which female work has been analyzed in Latin America. Rather than presenting a thorough review of all studies undertaken, we highlight the way in which three central issues in female labor force participation have been treated: the impact of global economic changes on female market labor, the links between family and work, and the overall consequences of labor activity on women's condition.