Abstract

This paper is aimed at analyzing the existing relationships between civil society and the emergence of new forms of governability in Latin America in an environment of economic globalization. Under the theoretical framework of collective action theory, the actions of new social movements and their relations to networking structures in civil society are analyzed.

Keywords

Collective action theory, new social movements, civil society, new forms of governability.