Abstract
This paper depicts an outline of the present situation of higher education in Mexico regarding the teaching of social and political sciences, as well as public administration. The author believes that the goals in teaching these subjects are: offering a variety of professional options with flexible designs; ensuring the possibility of passing from the traditional school system to the open system; giving several alternatives for graduating; providing with versatile training; and producing new methods for the teaching-learning activity.