Abstract

This research characterizes the same sex couple relationships in Bogota's context by comparing a group of people with current partner and one without a partner. Using a non-probabilistic convenience sampling through a snowball design a in-depth interview was applied to a sample of 60 homosexual (30 men, 30 women). They were asked about aspects of the affective experience (formation of the relationship, satisfaction, conflict management). The results show the participants have a positive view of their couple's life, without significant differences in the perception of the two groups in the aspects evaluated.
