Abstract
The autonomous Zapatista municipalities are analyzed from an anthropological perspective; the reasons for which they were formed; the government offensive to dismantle them; the social aftermath of this new paradigm of war; and the failure of unilateral remunicipalization in Chiapas. The histories of the rebellious municipalities in the reconstruction of life and the role of gender differences in this process are explored.