Abstract
This writing presents a reading of the phenomenon of forced displacement in Colombia through the experience of a group of women that inhabited before in different places of Atlantic Costa and, at the moment, they are located in the Commune 1 of Montería City. These women, home head, have been forced to abandon their territories of life and to assume an itinerant condition that has tied them to multiple territories that inhabited in searching of sustenance, in those that they interwove a life for them and their family group. From a population perspective, we show up strategies of survival; the relationship with the space of life, from women family head that have settled down in Montería City (Colombia).

Keywords
Territories of life, itinerancies, resettlement, forced displacement.