Abstract

The present paper discusses the individual-group relationships, based on their inevitable inter-connections. Departing from two metaphors that represent groupality, the Greek myth of Lerna's Hydra and the "ice-cream cup", we propose representations for groups that allow the identification of intersubjectivity and transubjectivity. We conclude with a discussion of the complex composition of the human individual, who has, within himself, all humanity.

Keywords

Group, individual, p.sychoanalysis, group analysis.