Abstract
The present article - written within the framework of a research project- attempts to analyze the perceptions of students belonging to popular sectors attending secondary schools at Plottier, a locality near Neuquén City (Argentina). The results reflect diverse manifestations of antichilean prejudice. The first advances of this systematization would indicate that, given the growing impoverishment of popular and middle sectors, these attitudes would be strengthened due to the need to differentiate from whom, due to some feature, could be considered inferior.
