Abstract
Social Work in Housing has been characterized by its contribution to the improvement of the quality of life and the social conditions of habitability, and to the promotion of equal opportunities in the access to adequate housing. For this purpose, we have been working with individuals, organizations and communities to improve their self-empowerment and problem solving skills, as much as to advance social policies promoting public housing welfare. This article presents both a view on these aspects, and the results of qualitative research that was conducted in Tenerife on the perceived improvements in the quality of life of the people interviewed, upon being awarded a Housing Officer Protection Public Advocacy.
