Abstract

The paper studies the impact of openness on the slowdown of productivity among Spanish regions observed in the last two decades. The empirical analyses carried out for 12 sectors and 17 regions over 1981-1995 show a negative and significant effect, so that, as openness to international trade increases, divergence in productivity becomes wider.

Keywords

Regional convergence, international trade, technological spillovers.