Abstract
Notwithstanding the development of important integration schemes, the Greater Caribbean continues to be a region characterized by a lack of communication among its members. It also remains at the margin of communication patterns that are rapidly being developed in other parts of the world. Hegemonic mass media structures concentrated in the North and Europe prevail, leading to an absence of information regarding the region. The study also includes a series of proposals regarding the role that NGOs can play in building regional mass media communities.

Keywords
Greater Caribbean, Integration, Communications Media, Dependency, Civil Society.