Abstract
The constant development of digital technologies and the Internet has meant that we live in a digital world based on connections. The way we learn has changed and, therefore, so has the way we teach. Knowledge is online and teachers should be the ones guiding students in their learning process. Technology alone does not guide; therefore, teachers’ work is more important today than ever. In this article, we present how the digital age has led to a need to rethink the role of teachers in the classroom.
