Abstract
Violence in human rights affects men as well as women, but the permanence of cultural structures and gender violence in power and control relationships permits identifying violence against women as a kind of gender violence. The scarcity of statistical and conceptual information on gender violence, since it is considered as socially accepted behavior, makes it difficult to understand and evaluate its magnitude. This research focuses on finding and analyzing the prevalence of gender violence in the relationship of couples. The study sample corresponds to women students t the Faculty of Education enrolled in the Geography and Earth Sciences specialty at the University of Andes-Táchira, Venezuela. The main results of the study show that gender violence is a social problem that affects a large number of women and that psychological violence in the engagement relation prevails over physical and sexual violence, but the presence of one does not exclude the other. Personal, family and institutional factors tend to support this conduct and reinforce the image of a woman as subordinate, inscribed in a symbolic space that reinforces and defends violence in its various manifesta.
