Abstract
In this paper, the construction of a logic of the exclusion, compared with the formation of identities currently operating under the aegis of self-segregation, is being carried on. It is described how subjects previously diagnosed with HIV elaborate a singular development that lead them beyond the diagnosis. At the same time, a comparison between this step towards the development, and the experience of the bug chasers that group from segregation to contract the virus. At the end, the analytical work shows the exclusion in the difference between a social tie that is built from the detachment via a treatment, as opposed to one that cancels any possibility of a tie for the sake of training points to the allegorical death of the subject.

Keywords
Segregation; Exclusion; Social tie; HIV.