Abstract

This article explores the particularities of a characterization that was highly common in the political discourse of the 20s: being revolutionary. By styling themselves as authentic revolutionaries, a group of politicians obtained concrete political and legal advantages, such as the accreditation of deputies and senators in Congress.