Abstract

From the example of the Mexican indigenismo, this brief work attempts to articulate some general reflections about the intricate relationships between the anthropological discipline and the applied exercise of its knowledge. Furthermore, the broad outline of this work tries to show the impossibility of a really applied anthropology, and a reflection about the theoretical and epistemological problems that these attempts stir up in the anthropological thought.