Abstract

This paper studies the relations between the deputies of the Twenty-eighth Legislature (the second one after the Mexican Revolution) and President Venustiano Carranza. Ignacio Marvan disregards traditional historiography and concludes that the relations and clashes between Carranza and the legislators were not due to the presence of caudillos or to the lack of modern political parties, but to other institutional issues, such as the new constitution, the electoral laws, the non-reelection of the executive and the specific moment of the presidential cycle.