Abstract

The different considerations contained in this paper are derived from the job as a mediator in family conflicts in judicial contexts, from the clinical practice with families, parenting and marriage problems, and from a qualitative research made in the Psychology program, in which 12 moved-away parents were asked about the consequences produced in theirs-self being moved-away from their sons, and 8 experts (advisers of family, lawyers and psychologists of the courts of family). It was found that to be involved in this situations incite in the parents different degrees of physics, physiological and social consequences. In the same way, it was established that actions exerted from justice are ineffective to help to disarticulate the conducts of obstruction for the entailment of the disturber parent. Except in slight cases where the indications and the laws end up being respected, although of irregular way.
