Abstract

The mining camps in the northern section of Chile have become an important source of socialization. Their importance has been dependent upon. The capitalistic transformations, where the crises and the technological developments have fostered new social relationships both inside and outside labor activity. In the 90s, this sector has recovered their importance, weakened for the first time in its history in the previous two decades.

Keywords

Mining - North of Chile - Human establishments.