From an analytical perspective that brings into play the interrelationships between social processes and spatial forms as an approach to understand space as social product and condition, this paper presents some reflections about the spatial representations used by "New Neighborhoods. My House, My Life", a housing policy implemented in 2003 by the Government of the Province of Cordoba, Argentina. Our aim is to contribute to the study of territories of relegation in contemporary cities, by calling into question the abstract idealization and rationalization that occurs from the neighborhood space, and the political intentions behind these new territorialities.

Abstract

From an analytical perspective that brings into play the interrelationships between social processes and spatial forms as an approach to understand space as social product and condition, this paper presents some reflections about the spatial representations used by "New Neighborhoods. My House, My Life", a housing policy implemented in 2003 by the Government of the Province of Cordoba, Argentina. Our aim is to contribute to the study of territories of relegation in contemporary cities, by calling into question the abstract idealization and rationalization that occurs from the neighborhood space, and the political intentions behind these new territorialities.
