Abstract

This article raises questions about the causes of feminine resistance and lack of acceptance of gender equality discourses. As its central hypothesis the article emphasizes the fact that such resistance is a result of the limits of the feminine discourse and because of this, it can not be considered as a universal dissertation. The limits found in the text focus on: the possible social and economic conditions, barriers created by the victimization discourse, the survival of the security privilege, and the consequences caused by the establishment of new gender roles in social structures.
