Abstract
The reality shows us that law is increasingly affected by a particular dynamic. Indeed, law is evolving by nature. That it can actually be definitely new it is the speed on which that evolution and the increasingly interrelations existing among the different legal areas. The ascending interaction and rapport between the international law and the constitutional law might also be new in a certain degree. However, this interaction to the international law and the constitutional law actually happens in wide realms of the constitutional legal system, and particularly happens in the human rights field. From our standpoint, the penetration of international human rights law in the constitutional law field has a consequence in the constitutional law sources, in the sense that it modifies the hierarchical order of the sources and yet its articulation itself.

Keywords
Constitutional law, International law, human rights, interaction between legal systems, penetration of the International law.