Abstract

Education in Buenos Aires was an ignored subject by historians in Argentina even before Common Education Law 1884. This article aims to investigate education world in Buenos Aires by studying private schools held by English, Scotches, Irish, and Americans and therefore their descendants that settled in the city since 1820. For this investigation we worked with foreign schools press advertisement for English speakers, police records, and National official registration Document for schools in 1872 and English speakers experts opinion on children and education of foreign people’s children, because of these sources study we found that English private schools were part of a diversified Educational world in Buenos Aires, in order to develop a privileged spot for native and foreigners education. These schools offered a variety of subjects being more complex than public schools' and other similar private schools offer getting to educate several important members of local society, presenting itself as a new alternative to the poor and inefficient State’s educational system during 19th century.
