Abstract

Victims of violence in the Magdalena department have been silenced by the systematic government, society and mass media oversight. They don’t consider the almost continuous suffering of those traditionally people excluded from society when they are setting their agendas. In this process of constant denial and postponement of the rights of people living in forcibly displace the victims of violence develop both internal and external resilience. In the article below we return the key aspects of the complete investigation on communication memory and resilience developed by the school of social communication and journalism from the Sergio Arboleda University sectional Santa Marta.
