Abstract
This paper aims to analyze the process of identity formation of the human rights movement under the last military dictatorship in Argentina. As it will be shown, this new form of political identification found its primal expression in the mobilization and activism of the relatives of the victims of repression and its condition of possibility in the increasing availability of the human rights discourse in the national context of that time.

Keywords
Human rights discourse, solidarity, antagonism, political engagement.